

Young Javelina

Two young javelina had been abandoned by their herds because they were so ill that they could not keep up. Our volunteers hurried to rescue these young animals. Each was found lying under bushes, gasping for air and unable to stand. They were quickly brought in for treatment, where it was discovered they had upper respiratory disease. Without treatment they would have died. They were immediately put on oxygen in our oxygen chamber, where they were nebulized every two hours, around the clock. We are happy to report that they are now doing well and will be released back into the wild when they have the best chance of survival.
